Course Description:

This is a topic course in economics of education. We will discuss central issues regarding this field such as estimating the returns to education, human capital and signaling theories of education, education and economic growth, education and economic equality, peer effects, entrance channels and students academic performance,..., etc. We will primarily focus on empirical applications while sometimes theoretical work will be referred to. The introduction of suitable empirical strategies (i.e., a variety of econometric techniques) along with the search for identification will be much emphasized throughout this course.

The ultimate goal of this course is to motivate PhD or master students conducting a quality research on economics of education. Thereby, students will be required to initiate a new project related to the course, survey the literature, collect data, summarize basic statistics, estimate the specified model, test certain hypothesis, conduct sensitivity analysis, discuss empirical findings, propose policy suggestions (if any), present the process regularly in class, and lastly end up with writing a formal article (ready for submission if possible).

Prerequisites:

ECON 5033 (ECON 7033 recommended) or equivalent graduate level econometrics
